Normalization allows each feature to have an equal influence on the model, which facilitates faster and more reliable convergence during gradient descent. This process also contributes to building more stable and interpretable models.

However, it's a misconception to think that normalization prevents features with larger ranges from dominating. Additionally, it's not always necessary for algorithms such as KNN, as they can perform well without it in some cases.